Wayne Ward's career as a journalist included work with The Globe and Mail, The London Free Press, The Washington Post and The Toronto Star, where he was the paper's Vancouver bureau chief and deputy news editor. But it was as a volunteer with St. John Ambulance's Emergency Medical Care unit that Ward discovered his passion for the media. "When people are in trouble, it can be very dramatic and at times, very dramatic can be very heroic," he said. He put that observation into practice in August, 1975 when he was filming a live broadcast on the steps of Elgin Street United Church at the time of the church's baptism service. From left, Wayne Ward, Jim Spence and Morris Schwab in June 1975. (Wayne Ward) "This is a very dramatic moment for the church because it's the first baptism of a baby born to a member of the Elgin Street United Church." They report live to CBC reporter Jim Spence and also to the local radio stations. Wayne Ward When the baby is born the mothers collapse and the father crawls forward on his hands and knees to give birth. "People were already rushing to be at the front to record this, and they're all fighting for positions, and this is just another person. It's just another baby," Ward said. The baby's father crawls forward to deliver his baby, but everyone struggles to record the birth.
