Pai also said that the FCC, which has outlined the proposal as a "historic and necessary" step to address broadband investment and competition, needs to be "mindful of the limits of its authority" as it faces opposition in Congress, the courts, and the public. "This is a historic and necessary step," Pai wrote. "It will help address persistent and widespread problems with broadband deployment and competition in the United States, and it will promote American prosperity and security." Pai outlined the main goals of the move in a draft proposal from May. Pai's comments are the first from the FCC chairman on the subject. He says Title II would make "more broadband investment, improve access for rural consumers, and give new providers an important regulatory platform from which to compete for years to come." Without the rules, cable companies and phone providers aren't subject to common federal restrictions on what they can charge to deliver broadband. Pai has said the move is necessary to create more competition. The rules are supposed to take effect in 2019, a year after the FCC voted in December to move ahead with the plan.
